

Death,
Mourning, and Burial

A CROSS-CULTURAL READER

SECOND EDITION

Edited by

ANTONIUS C.G.M. ROBBEN

WILEY Blackwell

Death, Mourning, and Burial

Death, Mourning, and Burial

A Cross-Cultural Reader

Second Edition

Edited by

Antonius C. G. M. Robben

WILEY Blackwell

This edition first published 2018
Editorial material and organization © 2018 John Wiley & Sons, Inc.

Edition History

Blackwell Publishing Ltd (1e, 2004)

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, except as permitted by law. Advice on how to obtain permission to reuse material from this title is available at <http://www.wiley.com/go/permissions>.

The right of Antonius C. G. M. Robben to be identified as the author of the editorial material in this work has been asserted in accordance with law.

Registered Office(s)

John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 111 River Street, Hoboken, NJ 07030, USA

Editorial Office

9600 Garsington Road, Oxford, OX4 2DQ, UK

For details of our global editorial offices, customer services, and more information about Wiley products visit us at www.wiley.com.

Wiley also publishes its books in a variety of electronic formats and by print-on-demand. Some content that appears in standard print versions of this book may not be available in other formats.

Limit of Liability/Disclaimer of Warranty

While the publisher and authors have used their best efforts in preparing this work, they make no representations or warranties with respect to the accuracy or completeness of the contents of this work and specifically disclaim all warranties, including without limitation any implied warranties of merchantability or fitness for a particular purpose. No warranty may be created or extended by sales representatives, written sales materials or promotional statements for this work. The fact that an organization, website, or product is referred to in this work as a citation and/or potential source of further information does not mean that the publisher and authors endorse the information or services the organization, website, or product may provide or recommendations it may make. This work is sold with the understanding that the publisher is not engaged in rendering professional services. The advice and strategies contained herein may not be suitable for your situation. You should consult with a specialist where appropriate. Further, readers should be aware that websites listed in this work may have changed or disappeared between when this work was written and when it is read. Neither the publisher nor authors shall be liable for any loss of profit or any other commercial damages, including but not limited to special, incidental, consequential, or other damages.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Names: Robben, Antonius C. G. M., editor.

Title: Death, mourning, and burial : a cross-cultural reader / edited by Antonius C.G.M. Robben.

Description: Second Edition. | Hoboken, NJ : John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 2017. |

Includes bibliographical references and index.

Identifiers: LCCN 2016058001 (print) | LCCN 2016058951 (ebook) | ISBN 9781119151746 (Paper) |

ISBN 9781119151753 (Adobe PDF) | ISBN 9781119151760 (ePub)

Subjects: LCSH: Funeral rites and ceremonies—Cross-cultural studies.

Classification: LCC GN486 .D43 2017 (ebook) | LCC GN486 (print) | DDC 393—dc23

LC record available at <https://lccn.loc.gov/2016058951>

Cover image: © BERKO85/iStockphoto

Cover design by Wiley

Set in 10.5/13pt Perpetua by SPi Global, Pondicherry, India

Contents

Acknowledgments	viii
Death and Anthropology: An Introduction Antonius C. G. M. Robben	1
Part I Conceptualizations of Death	17
1 A Contribution to the Study of the Collective Representation of Death Robert Hertz	19
2 The Rites of Passage Arnold van Gennep	34
3 Symbolic Immortality Robert Jay Lifton and Eric Olson	44
4 Remembering as Cultural Process Elizabeth Hallam and Jenny Hockey	52
5 Massive Violent Death and Contested National Mourning in Post-Authoritarian Chile and Argentina: A Sociocultural Application of the Dual Process Model Antonius C. G. M. Robben	64
Part II Death, Dying, and Care	77
6 Magic, Science and Religion Bronislaw Malinowski	79

Contents

7	Witchcraft, Oracles and Magic among the Azande E. E. Evans-Pritchard	83
8	Living Cadavers and the Calculation of Death Margaret Lock	90
9	All Eyes on Egypt: Islam and the Medical Use of Dead Bodies amidst Cairo's Political Unrest Sherine Hamdy	102
10	The Optimal Sacrifice: A Study of Voluntary Death among the Siberian Chukchi Rane Willerslev	115
11	Love's Labor Paid for: Gift and Commodity at the Threshold of Death Ann Julienne Russ	129
Part III Grief and Mourning		149
12	The Andaman Islanders A. R. Radcliffe-Brown	151
13	Grief and a Headhunter's Rage Renato Rosaldo	156
14	Death Without Weeping Nancy Scheper-Hughes	167
15	Three Days for Weeping: Dreams, Emotions, and Death in the Peruvian Amazon Glenn H. Shepard Jr.	181
16	The Expression of Grief in Monkeys, Apes, and Other Animals Barbara J. King	202
Part IV Mortuary Rituals and Epidemics		209
17	Hunting the Ancestors: Death and Alliance in Wari's Cannibalism Beth A. Conklin	211
18	State Terror in the Netherworld: Disappearance and Reburial in Argentina Antonius C. G. M. Robben	217
19	Mourning Becomes Eclectic: Death of Communal Practice in a Greek Cemetery Diane O'Rourke	231
20	'We Are Tired of Mourning!' The Economy of Death and Bereavement in a Time of AIDS Liv Haram	250
Part V Remembrance and Regeneration		263
21	Ancestors as Elders in Africa Igor Kopytoff	265

22	The Life, Death, and Rebirth of a Mapuche Shaman: Remembering, Disremembering, and the Willful Transformation of Memory Ana Mariella Bacigalupo	276
23	The Ghosts of War and the Spirit of Cosmopolitanism Heonik Kwon	293
24	The Intimacy of Defeat: Exhumations in Contemporary Spain Francisco Ferrándiz	306
	Index	319

Acknowledgments

This volume is the long overdue second edition of Death, Mourning, and Burial: A Cross-Cultural Reader (2004). Groundbreaking conceptual approaches and new research fields were developed in the anthropology of death during the last decade that have produced many original publications. The selection of the most important texts was greatly helped by the review reports of the manuscript prospectus. The constructive comments and generous suggestions made by half a dozen anonymous colleagues resulted in important adjustments of the proposed table of contents. This book owes its publication to the warm encouragement of the Anthropology and Archaeology assistant editor Mark Graney. Mark is no longer with the press but he passed this project into the capable hands of Justin Vaughan and Tanya McMullin. Liz Wingett deserves much credit for the manuscript preparation and her persistence in surmounting several obstacles in the permissions clearance process. Finally, I want to thank Tom Bates for the manuscript production.

The editor and publishers gratefully acknowledge the permission granted to reproduce the copyright material in this book:

1. Extracts from Robert Hertz, "A Contribution to the Study of the Collective Representation of Death" (1905–6), from Death and the Right Hand, translated by Rodney and Claudia Needham, published by Cohen & West in 1960. Reproduced with permission from Taylor & Francis.
2. Extract from Arnold van Gennep, The Rites of Passage (1909), translated by Monika B. Vizedom and Gabrielle L. Caffee, published by University of Chicago Press in 1960. Reproduced with permission from University of Chicago Press.
3. Robert Jay Lifton and Eric Olson, "Symbolic Immortality," from Living and Dying, published by Wildwood House and Praeger Publishing, Inc. in 1974. Reproduced with permission from South-Western College Publishing, a division of Cengage Learning.
4. Elizabeth Hallam and Jenny Hockey, "Remembering as Cultural Process," from Death, Memory and Material Culture, published by Berg in 2001. Reproduced with permission from Berg Publishers, an imprint of Bloomsbury Publishing.

5. Antonius C. G. M. Robben, “Massive Violent Death and Contested National Mourning in Post-Authoritarian Chile and Argentina: A Sociocultural Application of the Dual Process Model,” Death Studies, 38.5 (2014): 335–45. Reproduced with permission from Taylor & Francis and A. Robben.
6. Extract from Bronislaw Malinowski, “Magic, Science and Religion” (1925), in Magic, Science and Religion, edited by James Needham, published by Doubleday in 1954. Reproduced with permission from SPCK.
7. Extract from E. E. Evans-Pritchard, Witchcraft, Oracles and Magic among the Azande, published by Oxford University Press in 1937 and 1968. Reproduced with permission from Oxford University Press.
8. Margaret Lock, “Living Cadavers and the Calculation of Death,” Body and Society, 10.2–3 (2004): 135–52. Reproduced with permission from Sage and M. Lock.
9. Sherine Hamdy, “All Eyes on Egypt: Islam and the Medical Use of Dead Bodies amidst Cairo’s Political Unrest,” Medical Anthropology, 35.3 (2016): 220–35. Reproduced with permission from Taylor & Francis and S. Hamdy.
10. Rane Willerslev, “The Optimal Sacrifice: A Study of Voluntary Death among the Siberian Chukchi,” American Ethnologist, 36.4 (2009): 693–704. Reproduced with permission from American Anthropological Association and R. Willerslev.
11. Ann Julienne Russ, “Love’s Labor Paid For: Gift and Commodity at the Threshold of Death,” Cultural Anthropology, 20.1 (2005): 128–55. Reproduced with permission from American Anthropological Association and A. Russ.
12. Extract from A. R. Radcliffe-Brown, The Andaman Islanders (1922), published, with additions, by Cambridge University Press in 1933. © Cambridge University Press, 1933. Reproduced with permission from Cambridge University Press.
13. Renato Rosaldo, “Introduction: Grief and a Headhunter’s Rage,” in Culture and Truth: The Remaking of Social Analysis, published by Beacon Press in 1989. Reproduced with permission from Beacon Press.
14. Extracts from Nancy Scheper-Hughes, Death Without Weeping: The Violence of Everyday Life in Brazil, published by University of California Press in 1992. Reproduced with permission from University of California Press.
15. Glenn H. Shepard Jr., “Three Days for Weeping: Dreams, Emotions, and Death in the Peruvian Amazon,” Medical Anthropology Quarterly, 16.2 (2002): 200–29. Reproduced with permission from American Anthropological Association and G. Shephard.
16. Barbara J. King, “The Expression of Grief in Monkeys, Apes, and Other Animals,” in Raymond Corbey and Annette Lanjouw (eds.), The Politics of Species: Reshaping Our Relationships with Other Animals, published by Cambridge University Press in 2013. Reproduced with permission from Cambridge University Press and B. J. King.
17. Beth A. Conklin, “Hunting the Ancestors: Death and Alliance in Wari’ Cannibalism,” Latin American Anthropology Review, 5.2 (1993): 65–70. Reproduced with permission from American Anthropological Association and B. A. Conklin.
18. Antonius C. G. M. Robben, “State Terror in the Netherworld: Disappearance and Reburial in Argentina,” in Jeffrey A. Sluka (ed.), Death Squad: The Anthropology of State Terror, published by University of Pennsylvania Press in 2000. Reproduced with permission from University of Pennsylvania Press.
19. Diane O’Rourke, “Mourning Becomes Eclectic: Death of Communal Practice in a Greek Cemetery,” American Ethnologist, 34.2 (2007): 387–402. Reproduced with permission from American Anthropological Association and D. O’Rourke.
20. Liv Haram, “‘We Are Tired of Mourning!’ The Economy of Death and Bereavement in a Time of AIDS,” in Hansjörg Dilger and Ute Luig (eds.), Morality, Hope and Grief: Anthropologies of AIDS in Africa, published by Berghahn Books in 2010. Reproduced with permission from Berghahn Books.

Acknowledgments

21. Igor Kopytoff, "Ancestors as Elders in Africa," Africa: Journal of the International African Institute, 41.2 (1971): 129–42. Reproduced with permission from Cambridge University Press.
22. Ana Mariella Bacigalupo, "The Life, Death, and Rebirth of a Mapuche Shaman: Remembering, Disremembering, and the Willful Transformation of Memory," Journal of Anthropological Research, 66.1 (2010): 97–119. Reproduced with permission from the Regents of the University of New Mexico/Journal of Anthropological Research.
23. Heonik Kwon, "The Ghosts of War and the Spirit of Cosmopolitanism," History of Religions, 48.1 (2008): 22–42. Reproduced with permission from University of Chicago Press and H. Kwon.
24. Francisco Ferrándiz, "The Intimacy of Defeat: Exhumations in Contemporary Spain," in Carlos Jerez-Farrán and Samuel Amago (eds.), Unearthing Franco's Legacy: Mass Graves and the Recovery of Historical Memory in Spain, published by Notre Dame Press in 2010. Reproduced with permission from F. Ferrándiz.

Death and Anthropology: An Introduction

Antonius C. G. M. Robben

Every autumn, men and women in the United Kingdom wear red paper poppies to commemorate the British troops who died in World War I and later armed conflicts. Adopted in 1921, the modest symbol was inspired by the first two lines of a poem written in 1915 by John McCrea, a medical officer of the Canadian Expeditionary Force: “In Flanders fields the poppies blow / Between the crosses, row on row” (McCrae 1919). The poppy was only one of many reminders in the decade after the carnage of the Great War. More than nine hundred British military cemeteries dotted the landscapes of Belgium and France in 1918 (Hurst 1929). A Tomb of the Unknown Warrior was placed in Westminster Abbey in 1920 to honor unidentified soldiers. There were hundreds of thousands of psychiatric casualties, and many families continued to mourn their dead loved ones. Spirit photographs were taken on Remembrance Day in 1922 that showed the ghosts of fallen soldiers, and artists grappled in the interwar years with the sense of it all (Eksteins 1989; Mosse 1990; Winter 1995).

In 2014, a remarkable bed of red poppies sprouted at the foot of the Tower of London. Two artists had created the installation Blood Swept Lands and Seas of Red to mark the one-hundredth anniversary of the British entry into World War I. The field of 888,246 hand-made ceramic poppies represented the number of British fatalities.¹ I visited the display on a Saturday afternoon in October 2014, and saw thousands of people lining the ramparts that surround the grounds. I struck up a conversation with a middle-aged couple from Cheshire. They had made the journey to London to see the open-air installation, and pay tribute to the relatives who had sacrificed their lives in the Great War. The woman’s grandfather had served as a young paramedic. He survived the war but never recovered from the mental shocks received across the Channel. Even though there was no one left in 2014 with a living memory of fighting the war, still nearly 4 million people came from all over Great Britain to see the display.² The annual commemorations, the works of art, and the personal mementos gave the century-old dead a presence in people's consciousness which meant deceased relatives and compatriots continued to be remembered.

One of the casualties of World War I was the French anthropologist Robert Hertz. He was stationed near Verdun and died on April 13, 1915, after volunteering for an offensive mission towards Marchéville-en-Woëvre across open terrain defended by German machine guns (Parkin 1996: 13). Hertz (1905–6) had written what has become the single most influential text in the anthropology of death, of which large portions are reproduced in this anthology. The elaborate death rituals of the Dayak in Kalimantan, Indonesia, may seem far removed from the hasty burial of massive numbers of dead in World War I and the collective prayers said for their souls at public war funerals (Capdevila and Voldman 2006). Yet, the two mortuary practices share a general concern for carrying out society's social and moral obligations to the dead, and show analogies in the representation and destiny of the lamented souls. Hertz writes that the soul's departure for the land of the dead after reburial is not necessarily permanent: "In certain Indonesian societies the appeased souls are actually worshipped, and they then settle near the domestic hearth in some consecrated object or in a statuette of the deceased which they animate: their presence, duly honoured, guarantees the prosperity of the living" (see Chapter 1). Are the paper and ceramic poppies not also imbued with the souls and memories of the dead, and does the playing of the "Last Post" in the Belgian town of Ypres – every day since 1928 – not only pay homage to the dead but remind us also of the tolls of war and the value of peace?

The anthropology of death has been struggling with the cultural diversity and structural similarity of mortuary rituals since the discipline's early days. Anthropologists and sociologists around the turn of the nineteenth century, such as Tylor (1930), Durkheim (1995), Hertz (1960), and Van Gennep (1960), compared funerary rituals and death cultures through their overarching evolutionary, functionalist, and structuralist approaches. This period ended when anthropologists like Malinowski (1954), Radcliffe-Brown (1933), Goody (1962), and Evans-Pritchard (1968) began to conduct long-term fieldwork. They revealed the varying collective responses to death, and showed that the Western understandings and scholarly interpretations of death and ritual differed significantly from those of other cultures. The analytical pendulum swung back towards more comparative approaches during the 1970s and 1980s in such works as Rosenblatt, Walsh, and Jackson (1976), Huntington and Metcalf (1979), Bloch and Parry (1982), and Palgi and Abramovitch (1984). At the same time, anthropologists continued to conduct ethnographic fieldwork but their studies differed from the earlier ethnographies because of the influence of postmodern, reflexive and deconstructive approaches in American anthropology. Without trying to be exhaustive, the most important monographs are Badone (1989), Catedra (1992), Clark-Decès (2005), Conklin (2001), Danforth (1982), Desjarlais (2003), Green (2008), Hinton (2005), Hockey (1990), Kan (1989), Klima (2002), Kwon (2006), Lock (2002), Nelson (2008), Parry (1994), Robben (2005), Rosaldo (1980), Sanford (2003), Scheper-Hughes (1992), Seremetakis (1991), Suzuki (2000), Verdery (1999), Vitebsky (1993), and Whitehead (2002). This rich ethnographic harvest from the 1990s and 2000s has been spurring renewed efforts to formulate more general models and comparative approaches to the study of death, as will be shown in Part I of this volume.

This cross-cultural reader combines foundational texts in the anthropology of death with enduring texts from the 1970s to the 1990s and recent works from the 2000s and 2010s. The latter texts have been selected because of their innovative contribution to the field by benefiting from insights developed in medical anthropology, the anthropology of violence and trauma, and memory studies. The Reader's first edition was organized along a trajectory from dying to afterlife (Robben 2004). This new edition pays closer attention to fields of interest in the anthropology of death that have the promise of opening future lines of research.

Conceptualizations of Death

At the turn of the nineteenth century, anthropologists were looking for universal features in the diverse cultural responses to death, particularly in funerary rituals and expressions of mourning. Later generations became absorbed in the mortuary practices themselves through meticulous ethnographies and sophisticated interpretations without trying to formulate the type of generalizing statements of their predecessors. Conceptualizing death, grief, and mourning was so daunting in the face of the tremendous variation of funerary rituals that anthropologists shied away from general models and frameworks, with only few exceptions in the 1970s and 1980s as was mentioned above. In the early 1970s, Johannes Fabian (2004) bemoaned anthropology's parochialization, folklorization, and exoticization of death. An obsessive concern for cultural variation, the folkloric isolation of death as a self-contained experience, and a fascination with exotic mortuary practices inhibited the formulation of generalizations that transcended local peculiarities. This situation did not change in the following decades, but the need for general concepts and models was nevertheless felt as the ethnographies of death multiplied. In search of theoretical inspiration, anthropologists harked back to the work of Hertz and Van Gennep, often refreshing their models but only seldom engaging them critically. Some anthropologists, however, attempted to develop new concepts, models, and comparative frameworks. This section includes five comparative studies in the anthropology of death, namely two key articles by Hertz and Van Gennep from the 1900s, a text by Lifton and Olson from the 1970s, and two recent examples of comparative approaches by Hallam and Hockey, and Robben from the 2000s and 2010s.

The chapter by Robert Hertz, "A Contribution to the Study of the Collective Representation of Death," was published originally in 1905–6, and endures as a key text in the anthropology of death because of its comparative appeal. Hertz argued forcefully that the death of a human being is not exclusively a biological reality or confined to the individual sorrow of the bereaved relatives, but that death evokes moral and social obligations expressed in culturally determined funeral practices. Although Hertz restricts his analysis largely to the mortuary practices of South Asian tribal societies, he reveals a structure of great cross-cultural significance. In the excerpts included in this Reader, Hertz isolates the key elements in the secondary burials among the Dayak of Kalimantan, Indonesia. He points out that the inert body, the deceased's soul, and the surviving relatives play changing roles during the time between death and secondary burial; a time that he subdivides into two periods. First, there is the intermediary period during which (a) the inert body is temporarily stored or buried, (b) the soul of the deceased remains near the corpse, and (c) the bereaved relatives are separated from society and enter into mourning. Clearly, death does not occur at one moment in time but is a drawn-out process. The dead person is still considered part of society, and his or her continued residence among the living obliges them to provide food, engage in conversation, and show respect as if he or she were still alive. In a similar way, the deceased's soul does not depart for the land of the dead but wanders in the vicinity of the corpse and frequents the places where the deceased used to dwell. The bereaved relatives fear the soul's wrath for past wrongdoing, and are prone to appease the soul through sacrifices, taboos, and mourning. Furthermore, their sadness and weakness experienced at the loss might contaminate others. These circumstances make the mourners stand apart from society. They cannot participate in its daily routines, and wear distinctive clothing and ornaments.

The second and final period begins when the body has disintegrated sufficiently, the soul has detached from the deceased, and the mourners have properly expressed their grief and carried out their social obligations. Hertz sums up this second period as follows: "The final ceremony has three objects: to give burial to the remains of the deceased, to ensure the soul peace and access to the land of the dead, and finally to free the living from the obligations of mourning" (see Chapter 1). In contrast to the temporary burial of the first period, the final burial is a collective affair through which the deceased joins the ancestors and the community bids him or her farewell. The surviving relatives can now end their mourning. They cleanse themselves ritually from the impurities of their extended proximity to death, change into new clothing, and reunite with the community.

Arnold van Gennep made an equally important contribution to the cross-cultural study of death by interpreting mortuary rituals as one among similar rites of passage: "The life of an individual in any society is a series of passages from one age to another and from one occupation to another" (Van Gennep 1960: 2–3). These transitions, such as birth, puberty, marriage, and death, are life crises that become the subject of elaborate elevation rituals as a person rises from one status to the next. These rituals take place in what Durkheim (1995) has called sacred time, and what Turner (1967) has named liminal time. Van Gennep's book The Rites of Passage (1960) was originally published in 1909. The chapter included in this collection discusses funerals.

Mortuary transition or elevation rituals have three distinct phases. First, there is a relatively short preliminary phase characterized by a rite of separation that isolates the corpse and the mourners from society, and makes them wear special clothing and observe certain taboos. The rite of transition takes place during the second or liminal phase that marks the passage from the land of the living to the afterworld. This phase has the most elaborate rituals because the journey is considered long and the deceased may have to be equipped with food, clothing, weapons, protective amulets, means of transportation, and a guide to lead the way. Finally, there is the postliminal rite of incorporation to indicate both the passage of the soul to the world of the dead and the return of the mourners to the bosom of society. The human remains are buried in a cemetery, placed in a tree, cremated, or separated in any other way from their temporary stay. The bereaved relatives join for a meal, sing songs or celebrate the final passage of the deceased. The mourning has come to an end, the social order has been restored, and the flow of everyday life is picked up again.

Robert Jay Lifton and Eric Olson postulate the universal fear of death in the chapter “Symbolic Immortality” from their book Living and Dying (1974), and like Malinowski (Chapter 6), they consider the belief in immortality as its universal response. Lifton and Olson reconcile Freud’s emphasis on the finality of biological death – and the human need to believe otherwise – with Jung’s attention to people’s search for meaning and immortality through religious symbolization. Lifton and Olson find this symbolic immortality in five modes of expression. Biological immortality consists of extending life through one’s offspring, family name, tribe or nation. The creation of literature, art works, and knowledge leads to the author’s creative immortality. Theological immortality refers to beliefs in resurrection, reincarnation, rebirth, and a spiritual life after death. Natural immortality makes people part of an eternal universe and the interminable cycles of nature. Finally, experiential immortality concerns altered states of consciousness such as ecstasy, enlightenment, drug-induced highs, and collective effervescence. The fear of death impels people to procure these modes of symbolic immortality to overcome their innate death anxiety, and live meaningful lives in the promise of continuity with others. Society reaps the good works of these personal quests but may also suffer its consequences when leaders pursue self-aggrandizing and megalomaniac projects through war, political repression, and economic exploitation. In the vein of Lifton and Olson, the sociologist Zygmunt Bauman has argued that people try to transcend the fear of death through culture and social organization. Culture is a defiant denial of death in the desire for meaning and immortality: “Without mortality, no history, no culture – no humanity” (Bauman 1992: 7).

Anthropology’s long-term interest in mortuary rituals and spirituality has its counterpart in archaeology’s study of material culture and funerary artifacts. Anthropology’s relative neglect of the material dimension of death cultures has been remedied by Elizabeth Hallam and Jenny Hockey, who developed a conceptual framework for the anthropological study of the materiality of death and mourning. In the chapter “Remembering as Cultural Process,” from their book Death, Memory and Material Culture (2001), they emphasize that material objects mediate people’s memory of the dead, and give cultural meaning to death through multi-varied, polysemous materializations. Artifacts as diverse as monuments, clothes, photographs, bodily gestures, inscriptions, and texts influence memory because they are relational constructs produced through a mutual constitution of material objects and human beings (see Gell 1998; Ingold 2011; Knappett 2016). The multiple contemporary and historical meanings of artifacts, and the memories they evoke, are dependent on place, time, power, gender, and the body. Meanings vary whether the spatial setting is sacred or communal, public or collective, and domestic or intimate. Time also influences the relation of material culture and memory, and not just because of the passage of time. Annual commemorations with dignitaries, national flags, and memorial wreaths shape the memory of the dead in other temporal ways than periodic family visits to the cemetery or the daily recollection of a deceased loved one by glancing at his or her photo in the living room. Power and gender relations among the mourners, and between the dead and the bereaved, influence the meaning of material objects and the representations of the dead. Finally, the mediation of the relation between the dead and the living exists as much in material objects as in the body. Embodied and sensorial memories can take the shape of corporeal practices, such as forms of dress and bodily movements that are reminiscent of the deceased.

In my contribution to this section (Robben 2014), entitled “Massive Violent Death and Contested National Mourning in Post-Authoritarian Chile and Argentina,” I adapt a constructivist model of social psychology about personal mourning to an anthropological analysis of national mourning. The significance of the dual process model of coping with bereavement over other psychological models of mourning exists in its equal attention to the primary loss of a loved one experienced by the bereaved, and the secondary loss of restoring a shattered life. The model interprets personal mourning as a process of oscillation between the reality of confronting the death and grieving over the painful loss (loss orientation), and facing the reality of a life without the deceased (restoration orientation) by for instance being forced to sell a home that has become too expensive to maintain. The first loss is more directed towards the past, while the second loss is more future-oriented. I have applied this psychological model to the multiple oscillations in the national mourning of mass assassinations and disappearances in Chile and Argentina, but this framework can just as well be used to understand the dual mourning of families, social groups, and communities.

Chile and Argentina were suffering from dictatorial regimes in the 1970s and 1980s that disappeared and assassinated tens of thousands of citizens suspected of revolutionary ideas and armed actions. The national mourning of these losses differed in the two countries because of a distinct politics of oscillation that was propelled by national governments in competition with conflicting social groups. Chile was more oriented towards rebuilding the postconflict society through reparative justice, the memorialization of the repressive past, and concerted attempts to achieve national reconciliation. It confined the primary loss orientation to documenting the truth about state terrorism, and providing psychological and social assistance to the bereaved. Argentina’s oscillation weighed more heavily on the side of loss orientation by prosecuting perpetrators, exhuming mass graves, and actively remembering the disappeared with street protests, while the country’s restoration orientation remained limited to the failed amnesty of convicted perpetrators and halfhearted reparation measures. This dual process approach demonstrates that the conceptualization of death should always take the conceptualization of life after death into account because of their mutual influence.

Death, Dying, and Care

The inevitability of biological death made the German physician and psychologist Wilhelm Wundt assume that people are dominated by a universal fear of death. Bronislaw Malinowski (1954) challenged this idea in his 1925 essay “Magic, Science and Religion.” He indicates that this universal fear is complemented by an equally universal denial of death through a belief in immortality. These two attitudes translate into an ambivalent attachment of the living and the dead. Surviving relatives want to break and at the same time prolong their association with the deceased. Close relatives accompany the loved one during the dying process, care for the corpse, assume the social status of mourners, and display their grief in public. Mortuary rituals separate the living from the dead. The corpse is removed from the place of death and undergoes some sort of transformation through burial, mummification, cremation or consumption, thus betraying the ambivalent relation between the living and the dead. The mourners are concerned about the dangers of the corpse and the contamination by death, but there reigns also a sublime sense of spirituality, hope, and otherworldliness. Malinowski considers such religious imagination as a functional response to death because people loathe the idea of a final ending. They cling to a belief in a spiritual life after death by imagining the salvation of an eternal spirit from the visibly decaying corpse. Thus, religion gives people a comforting sense of immortality, while the mortuary practices restore the group that has been temporarily disturbed by the death of one of its members.

Evans-Pritchard’s study Witchcraft, Oracles and Magic among the Azande (1968) provides a classic analysis of the cultural scenarios set in motion to deal with the disruptive consequences of a death caused by witchcraft. He notices that the Azande of southern Sudan distinguished between natural and magical causes of death. Snake bites, a collapsing granary or the wound of a spear were recognized as natural causes of death. However, these natural causes did not stand on their own but were related to secondary causes, usually witchcraft. Witchcraft made the victim cross the snake’s path, so both the witch and the snake killed the person. What happened when a person’s death was attributed to witchcraft? First, the bereaved relatives consulted a poison oracle (benge) to establish the cause of death. A noble administered poison to a chicken, asked the oracle whether a particular person was a witch, and waited for the poison to take effect. If the chicken died, then poison was given to a second chicken to validate the first outcome. If the second chicken was spared, then the oracle had confirmed the suspicion of witchcraft and the surviving family would take revenge by magically killing the guilty witch or by demanding material compensation.

Organ transplants have placed a tremendous moral pressure on people to accept the assumption that death can be established unequivocally and at a precise moment in time. Margaret Lock, in her article “Living Cadavers and the Calculation of Death” (2004), compares American and Japanese understandings of death, and reveals how distinct notions of personhood can account for differences in the procurement of organs. North American clinicians and the general public alike have always considered people to be dead when the heart stopped beating and the lungs stopped breathing. The first successful heart transplant in 1967 required a new medical definition of death to protect the legal rights of donors and physicians, and allow for the procurement of organs. The US 1981 Uniform Determination of Death Act stated that someone was considered dead when an irreversible coma had set in because the unconscious person was effectively brain dead, even though the body continued to function with the aid of a respirator. This meant that the person was considered dead, but not his or her body or organs. As Lock writes: “The patient has, therefore, assumed a hybrid status – that of a dead-person-in-a-living-body” (see Chapter 8). Death as the final stage in a process of dying with elaborate social and cultural significance was medicalized and turned into a biological certainty that became measurable in terms of time and neurological activity. Culture retreated from the brain-dead body, and organ donation was couched in a moral discourse that turned consent into a social obligation, praised the gift of life, and promised biological immortality.

The general acceptance by North American society of the brain-death definition contrasts sharply with the situation in Japan. The Japanese government defined brain death in 1985, and instituted in 1989 a special committee to present an authoritative opinion. Even though the committee agreed on the principle of organ transplants and that a biological death is not the same as the death of a person, a committee minority emphasized that brain death should not be equated with human death, which has been understood by the Japanese people as the absence of pulse, breathing, and pupil dilation. Many Japanese mistrusted the transplant surgeons who were believed to be eager to pronounce people brain dead to harvest their organs (Lock 2002: 167–71). A compromise was reached in 1997 when a law pronounced brain death as a particular form of death, and stipulated that organ donation required the written consent of the donor and the family. Contrary to the North American belief that the brain is the seat of personhood, the Japanese people believe that personhood exists in their social relations, relations that do not cease when the dying enter into an irreversible coma. Death is therefore not a precise event in time but an extended process that resists clinical definitions of brain death and makes people reluctant to donate their organs. Nevertheless, definitions of death are subject to change, and Lock expects that brain death will become more acceptable in Japan once the media begin to pay attention to the plight of potential organ recipients.

Egypt is another country where people’s beliefs about organ procurement can change. Sherine Hamdy explains in the chapter “All Eyes on Egypt” (2016) that Islamic scholars and religious leaders have been arguing since 1959 that the human soul and spirit are infinitely superior to the quickly decaying body, and that God will reward those who donate their remains for the benefit of others. Most Egyptians have nevertheless been against organ donation because they believe that the dead are capable of feeling, and deserve to be washed, shrouded, and treated with care before burial. This respect for the dead reflects also on the bereaved relatives, and opposes them to the invasive organ procurements. Furthermore, poor Egyptians have been highly suspicious of the corrupt public teaching hospitals where organs and corneas were repeatedly taken from their dead relatives without prior consent (Hamdy 2012). The misgivings about organ donation changed in 2011 when the brutal police repression of antigovernment street protests caused many eye injuries through the use of tear gas and rubber bullets. A cornea campaign was successful, according to Hamdy, because many protesters registered themselves as potential donors, and because the participation of doctors in the protests took away people’s suspicion of a medical establishment that used to sell organs on the black market. The donation of organs to blinded martyrs, who would then be able to continue the political struggle, and the belief in a reward from God motivated protesters to pledge their organs when killed. In the end, a public eye bank was not created, and the donation campaign fell apart for lack of state support.

The chapter “The Optimal Sacrifice” by Rane Willerslev (2009) analyzes voluntary death among the Chukchi, who are reindeer herders on the Kamchatka peninsula in northeastern Siberia. The non-Christian Chukchi have a perspectivist worldview in which the world of the living mirrors the world of the dead (Viveiros de Castro 1998). Both the dead and the living keep reindeer herds, and live with their families in tents and villages, but aspects such as night and day, winter and summer, and bodily skin and soft tissue, exist in reverse order. The world and the otherworld are communicating vessels in which a fixed number of souls circulates between the living and the dead in an endless cycle of renewal because body and soul are not different entities but each other’s flip side. This renewal is conditioned, however, by the superiority of the deceased over the living, and by the control and ownership of the life-giving souls by the dead. Reindeer and other surrogates for human beings are sacrificed to dissuade the deceased from demanding the return of the life-giving souls, and thus cause death or suicide in the world to welcome a deceased relative back in the otherworld. Willerslev distinguishes three forms of voluntary death: euthanasia, suicide, and sacrifice. Euthanasia refers to the abandonment of the sick and the aged in the inhospitable circumpolar North in order not to burden healthy relatives. Suicide among the Chukchi implies an identification of the victim with his or her deceased other, while the ritual blood sacrifice of a human being separates the victim from the deceased ancestor and differentiates the realms of life and death to make human existence possible. Sacrificial voluntary deaths occur most often at times of crisis, such as the bubonic plague or mass animal death, when the living need the help and protection of their more powerful dead ancestors. Care for the living and the common good will then persuade elderly Chukchi to sacrifice their lives to their ancestors.

Sacrifice and care are also central to hospices. Ann Julienne Russ (2005) shows in her article “Love’s Labor Paid for: Gift and Commodity at the Threshold of Death” that hospice workers in San Francisco were torn between the emotional need to provide compassionate care and the institutional demand of efficiency and profit. The hospice movement began in Great Britain in the 1960s with volunteers who provided human dignity to a dying process that had become increasingly institutionalized and commodified. The individualized treatment of terminally ill cancer patients in hospitals had displaced family care in the home of dying loved ones. The hospice provided palliative care and a dignified death in a welcoming environment. The movement soon spread to the United States, but its humanistic holism came under pressure in the 1990s when neoliberalism transformed hospices into commercial institutions. Hospice workers in San Francisco were looking after rising numbers of young gay men with HIV/AIDS, and they had difficulty reconciling the gift of unconditional love with the commodification of care through strict work schedules and protocols. Russ emphasizes that the hospice caregivers were not balancing opposed demands, as if these were measurable services, but that they themselves comprised the services that were dispensed as gifts and commodities. Instead of volunteers providing collective care, as was originally intended by the hospice movement, now each employee had to solve these contradictory demands individually and within themselves. The decision about how much care to give and how much care to withhold became a formation of self through which the gift of care and sacrifice was reciprocated with the patient’s gift of dying in their arms.

Grief and Mourning

Émile Durkheim has had a lasting influence on the anthropology of death by emphasizing that the individual grief experienced at the death of another human being is expressed collectively in culturally prescribed ways of mourning. Crying relates in the same way to grief as weeping and wailing relate to mourning. Mourning is not a spontaneous emotion but a collective obligation manifested in appeasement rituals. In his classic work The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, Émile Durkheim (1995) draws upon ethnographic accounts of Australian Aborigines to argue that the spontaneity of their wailing is deceptive, because all these expressions are clearly prescribed, controlled, and monitored by the community. Durkheim’s explanation of such rituals is that the death of an individual diminishes the group numerically and socially. Durkheim was fascinated by questions of social order and disintegration. This Hobbesian puzzle becomes particularly pressing in the case of death. Indifference to a death expresses a lack of moral and cultural unity, and an absence of social cohesion and solidarity. Instead, collective mourning helps to draw people closer together and invigorates the weakened social group. This social function of mourning rituals is not limited to the death of individuals. Mourning is a general expression of loss for a social collectivity under threat, as is demonstrated by Aboriginal rites for illness, famine, drought, and the desecration of religious symbols. Grief and mourning should therefore always be understood in relation to other losses that provoke personal and collective crises (Freud 1968).

Radcliffe-Brown (1964) demonstrates in the excerpt from his ethnography The Andaman Islanders how weeping and embracing are collective performances rather than spontaneous personal expressions of sorrow or happiness. The Andamanese can cry on demand when required by society. Radcliffe-Brown even suggests that these cultural practices produce the emotions which they are obliged to express, and affirm the social attachments that hold society together. He delineates seven occasions of ceremonial weeping related to initiations, marriages, deaths, friendships, and peace-making. These rites are subdivided into two varieties: reciprocal or symmetrical rites (meeting of friends or relatives, peace-making ceremonies, communal mourning) and one-sided or asymmetrical rites (wailing over a corpse, weeping over initiated novices and newly weds). The practice of embracing at reciprocal rites expresses the emotional attachment of two persons, while weeping provides relief from built-up tensions. This dual function becomes clear at the end of a mourning period when secluded mourners renew their social ties with the community. Weeping is a general response to loss, as shown not only in mortuary rituals but also in weddings and initiation ceremonies. Asymmetrical rites signify affective and collective attachments, and are expressed by embracing and weeping over the inert body, the novice or the newly wed. In the case of death, weeping and embracing manifest the social attachment of the living and the dead, enhance the social solidarity of the survivors, and mend the weakened social collectivity.

Renato Rosaldo reveals in "Grief and a Headhunter's Rage," his introduction to Culture and Truth (1989), how the accidental death of his wife Michelle in 1981 deepened his understanding of bereavement among the Ilongot of the Philippines. Bereaved Ilongot men used to engage in headhunting to dispel the rage embedded in their grief by severing and casting away the head of an unsuspecting victim. For the Ilongot, "grief, rage, and headhunting go together in a self-evident manner" (see Chapter 13). His wife's unfortunate fall to death during fieldwork provoked an unsuspected anger and rage in Rosaldo resembling that of bereaved Ilongot men. This personal reaction made him eventually shift his analysis from headhunting as a ritual manifestation of bereavement to headhunting as an expression of grief, rage, and emotional loss. A reinterpretation of the ethnographic record showed that headhunting was a common Ilongot response to severe loss. Not only the death of a close relative, but also dramatic life transitions made young Ilongot men boil over with anger and make them eager to take a head. Decades after his wife's tragic fall, Rosaldo (2014) published an anthropoetic exploration of his grief and the sorrow of the Ilongot at her death.

Nancy Scheper-Hughes has taken the cultural construction of bereavement one step further by arguing that not only mourning but grief itself is a product of culture. In the excerpts from her ethnography Death Without Weeping: The Violence of Everyday Life in Brazil (1992), she points out that mothers in a northeast Brazilian shantytown are aware of the structural causes of high infant mortality (poverty, malnutrition, poor health care) as well as the immediate causes (diarrhea, communicable diseases). Still, they endow babies with a life force, a will to live, whose strength will ultimately determine whether or not an infant survives. This belief makes mothers withhold food from weak, passive babies and give more food to strong, active babies. These Brazilian mothers accept the death of their weak infants stoically. Crying is even considered detrimental to the babies because the heavy tears on the thin angel wings burden their flight to heaven. Scheper-Hughes emphasizes that the maternal aloofness does not cover a deep sorrow, and the absence of a display of grief is not the repression of an inconsolable loss. The mother feels pity rather than grief for the baby.

Grief is commonly understood as people's struggle with the emotions surrounding a close death. Glenn Shepard demonstrates that grief may also include the sense of loss experienced by the dead on their departure from the living. In the chapter "Three Days for Weeping," Shepard (2002) explains how the Matsigenka of southeast Peru attribute illness and death to sexual assaults by ghosts, demons, and sorcerers that occur when people are dreaming or walking alone in the rainforest. Illness makes the soul (suretsi) leave the body temporarily, and only a shaman and herbal medicine can bring the soul back to the withering body. Death implies the slow but permanent detachment of the soul from the violated body. The lonely soul remains near the corpse as a rotten-smelling ghost that has such longing for the bereaved relatives that it wants to carry their souls to the afterworld, while in the meantime gathering all material possessions to imitate an earthly existence in the land of the dead. The mourners therefore fear and dehumanize the dead, and protect themselves from contamination by shaving their heads and painting their faces with a red dye to disguise themselves as red-spotted jaguars. Shepard argues that the bereaved have strong personal feelings of grief but do not express them in public mourning. The Matsigenka control their emotions over death, and have only a modest tearless burial, because any display of negative emotions may cause illness, social disruption, and eventual death.

The classification of animals and humans into different categories has been debated since Darwin developed the theory of evolution. Neuroscientists and anthropologists have described the unique cognitive abilities of human beings (Edelman 1992; Shore 1996), whereas primatologists have emphasized the similarities of humans and primates, and shown that both have the capacity for empathy (de Waal 2002; 2009). In “The Expression of Grief in Monkeys, Apes, and Other Animals,” Barbara King (2013a; see also 2013b) defines animal grief as the visual emotional manifestation of loss at the death of a loved group member. This emotional reaction is preceded by demonstrable signs of attachment between the two individuals by spending more time together than needed to survive. Animal grief exceeds therefore the distress shown at deaths that threaten survival, such as a weakened group defense or a lower reproduction rate. Visible signs of grief among monkeys and great apes include particular vocal or facial expressions, and the loss of appetite, weight, and social interaction. King takes great care in weighing the indirect evidence of nonhuman animal grief, and proposes a combination of field observations and physiological data, especially the stress hormone profiles. King concludes that a better understanding of animal grief will benefit the welfare of monkeys, apes, elephants, and dolphins in captivity. The same conclusion can be extended to human beings, as the importance of mortuary rituals and the emotional cost of the inability to bury one’s dead will show in Part IV.

Mortuary Rituals and Epidemics

Mortuary rituals are a true cultural universal that show people’s resistance to accepting biological death as a self-contained event, and express the desire to prolong the separation of the living and the dead through a process of phased transitions. The structuralist approaches developed by Hertz and Van Gennep continue to be important for the anthropology of death because they offer analytical frameworks that can be applied to every mortuary ritual. Still, the mortuary rituals on which Hertz and Van Gennep based their models existed in relative isolation. Mortuary rituals in this day and age are influenced by processes of globalization, and can no longer be taken for granted because of state authorities that prohibit indigenous funerary practices, disappear the dead, and control the disposal of the victims of ebola and HIV/AIDS, as is shown in Part IV.

The Brazilian authorities were shocked to learn in the 1960s that the Wari’ of western Amazonia consumed their deceased relatives. The integrity of the body, the sacredness of the corpse, and the burial of human remains are so deep-seated in Western culture that such endocannibalism could only provoke horror. Government officials and missionaries therefore forced the Wari’ to bury their dead. From the Wari’s perspective, however, not the eating of the dead but the Western practice of abandoning them to rot away in cold, uncaring soil was callous and heartless. Beth Conklin explains in her chapter “Hunting the Ancestors: Death and Alliance in Wari’ Cannibalism” that the mortuary cannibalism was a consequence of the reciprocal relation between humans and animals (Conklin 1993). Social ties continue to embody the corpse upon biological death as the deceased’s spirit materializes into a white-lipped peccary. Rather than merciless, endocannibalism was an expression of compassion for the bereaved relatives, helped severing the ties of the living and the dead, and contributed to the community’s subsistence by effectuating the transformation of humans into animals. The physical separation of the blood relatives from the corpse, and its subsequent dismemberment by the affines, were the most emotional moments of the funeral. After all, the cutting implied the severing of the embodied social ties, resembled the butchering of game, and marked the spirit's departure for the ancestral underwater world. Not the blood relatives, but the affines ate the roasted flesh and organs. This rite of transition dissipated grief by the consumption of the sociophysical body and its embodied identity and social ties. Most important, the practice resuscitated the Wari' spirit under water, and foreshadowed its incarnation into a peccary. This transformation from human into animal showed that the deceased cared for the surviving relatives by providing them with game for their subsistence. Grief ended after shamans had talked to the spirits embodied in hunted peccaries, and could provide comfort to the bereaved relatives by communicating the deceased's well-being (see Conklin 1995; 2001).

The Argentine people have agonized for decades over the predicament and unceremonious burial of thousands of citizens who were disappeared by the military dictatorship between 1976 and 1983. In the chapter "State Terror in the Netherworld: Disappearance and Reburial in Argentina" (Robben 2000), I describe how the Argentine armed forces and police used the disappearance of political opponents as a terror tactic to intimidate their comrades-in-arms, paralyze family protest, and exploit the cultural belief in the relation of body and spirit. The Argentine military abducted tens of thousands of civilians, kept them in captivity for months on end, and finally assassinated most of them. Their remains were cremated or buried in mass graves. One of the most gruesome assassinations was carried out by the Navy, which sedated its captives and dropped them from airplanes flying across the South Atlantic Ocean. After misleading the Argentine people for several years about the real fate of the disappeared, the Argentine military discovered to their dismay the political and especially emotional force of people's need to bury and mourn their dead. Incessant human rights protests helped to topple the regime, and allowed for the exhumation, identification, and reburial of hundreds of disappeared Argentines. The reburials manifested the Argentine belief in a political life after death, a life which the military wanted to extinguish and the relatives were determined to resurrect. The violent death of the disappeared contributed therefore directly to the survival of their spirit and their continuing influence on Argentine politics.

Mortuary rituals are not necessarily determined by strict cultural scenarios, as was implied by the work of Hertz and Van Gennep. Diane O'Rourke analyzes in her article "Mourning Becomes Eclectic" (2007) how the disinterment and reburial of ossified human remains in the Greek village of Lehonía has become more diverse and family oriented since the 1990s. In the past, the bones were exhumed, cleaned, and collected in a cotton cloth several years after the deceased had been buried during an elaborate funeral. The bundle was then reburied almost without ritual or post-disinterment attention to express people's equality before death, conclude the obligations to the dead, and mark the end of mourning. Social control enforced these cemetery practices; practices enhanced communal solidarity and restrained outward displays of grief. Today, family identity and the continued emotional expression of grief and remembrance have become more prominent. The exhumed bones are collected in boxes and adorned with flowers, mementos, and oil lamps. O'Rourke argues that the community's fear of death, shared religious beliefs, and conformity to scripted rituals have been replaced by an eclectic funerary culture that makes room for people's personal experience of death, and has given rise to ongoing disputes about the proper form and meaning of cemetery practices. She shifts the analysis of cemetery practices from the finality of death to the dynamics of personal and public life. In addition, O'Rourke positions the disinterments beyond the realm of liminality, and describes a complex feedback process between death practices and the social changes of everyday life. This process has resulted in the decline of a moral community of Christians, and the increasing public display of grief, social distinction, and family ties.

The world's HIV/AIDS epidemic has had considerable repercussions on death cultures, in particular when care, mourning, and burial rise above people's emotional and economic means. The chapter "'We Are Tired of Mourning!'" by Liv Haram (2010) reveals that the changing funeral practices between rich and poor among the Christian Meru of northern Tanzania were as much due to greater socioeconomic developments as to the numerous HIV/AIDS-related deaths. According to the Meru, the death rate rose rapidly in the 1990s because of the arrival of modernity or "progress" (maendeleo) that caused more geographic mobility, traffic accidents, interethnic mixing, alcohol and drug abuse, conspicuous consumption, and especially sexual promiscuity. Funerals of people who died of natural causes used to be elaborate communal affairs in which hundreds of relatives were fed for three to four days. The increasing number of funerals since the 1990s has impoverished some households, and made low-income families reduce the funeral to the day of burial. Instead, wealthy families have turned funerals into displays of conspicuous consumption with special mortuary clothing, a brass band, and professional cooks who prepare elaborate meals. At the same time, there has been pressure from nongovernmental organizations, and state and religious authorities, to limit the funeral and mourning to one day in order to lower costs and cut down on work absenteeism. The burden of caring for relatives with HIV/AIDS and mourning the death has fallen squarely on Meru women, and might possibly lead to their emotional withdrawal as they struggle to attend to everyone's needs.

Remembrance and Regeneration

The idea of death as the end of life, as an irreversible event or final station, is strong in the Western world, but many cultures have processual, cyclical or stage-like notions of death (Desjarlais 2016; Obeyesekere 2002). The strict division between the living and the dead exists in certain cultures but not in others. The selections in Part V focus on complex relations between the living and the dead through the intervention of spirits or the state. People may maintain an ongoing interaction with animate or embodied spirits, as Kopytoff (Chapter 21) and Bacigalupo (Chapter 22) demonstrate, whereas Kwon (Chapter 23) and Ferrándiz (Chapter 24) show that a powerful state may try to influence people's commemoration and remembrance of the dead.

Igor Kopytoff critiques in his article "Ancestors as Elders in Africa" (1971) the division between elders and ancestors made by Western anthropologists in their studies of African societies, and warns about the perils of ethnocentrism. These scholars described the authority of elders and the influence of powerful ancestors on the daily lives of their descendants correctly but, according to Kopytoff, they wrongfully imposed on them the Western life–death dichotomy. This bias made them conceptualize the respect of elders for their ancestors as ancestor cults and ancestor worship. Kopytoff examines the meaning of the key term bambuta (singular: mbuta) that means among the Suku of southwestern Congo-Kinshasa literally 'the big ones' or those who are older than oneself. The term applies both to elders and ancestors, or better, to living elders and dead elders or ancestors. Elders and ancestors do not pertain to the two discrete categories of the living and the dead but exist on a continuum that ranks them from younger to older, and from lower to higher status. Elders and ancestors are equally respected, and asked for support in times of sickness and misfortune, but whereas junior kinsmen and older kinsmen can speak face to face and maintain reciprocal relations, living elders can only make requests to dead elders in monologues and by making sacrifices at their grave or at a crossroad. Kopytoff argues that the Western cultural tradition attributes supernatural powers to the dead but does not believe in similar powers among the living, and therefore made Western anthropologists differentiate between elders and ancestors in African societies.

Ana Mariella Bacigalupo shows in her article "The Life, Death, and Rebirth of a Mapuche Shaman" (2010; see also 2016) how among the Chilean Mapuche the living and the dead, mythical time and worldly time, and personal and national histories are not separate but interacting ontologies through the mediation of shamans. Mapuche shamans (singular and plural: machi) can heal people, influence the future, and control human and natural disasters through their spiritual powers. Bacigalupo examines Mapuche shamanism through the lives, deaths, and rebirths of Rosa Curin and Francisca Colipi, who became thunder shamans after being struck by lightning. They were able to muster the force of deities, spirit animals and ancestral spirits to protect the Mapuche from earthquakes, massive floods, and attacks by the Chilean army. Their eventual deaths were feared because the living spirit (püllu) could become malevolent and harm the community. Francisca Colipi's corpse was therefore buried together with her slashed shamanic drum, and her earthly possessions were destroyed to prevent her spirit from remaining near the inert body. Her house was moved, and people no longer mentioned her name to cut her social and spiritual ties with the living. This process of deindividuation made the villagers forget Francisca Colipi and allowed her spirit to join the collective ancestral spirit (fileu). After several years, she was remembered again, but now in a collectivized way that will eventually allow her spirit and personality to reincarnate in a granddaughter. Oral narratives about shamans such as Rosa Curin and Francisca Colipi create a shamanic historical consciousness for the villagers that intertwine Mapuche agency and national Chilean history, and demonstrate their identity and self-determination. Furthermore, the interventions of Mapuche spirits in cataclysmic events make historical processes and human actions follow the cosmic cyclical pattern of order and chaos, and good versus evil.

Heonik Kwon shows in his article “The Ghosts of War and the Spirit of Cosmopolitanism” (2008) how citizens and the state may clash over public death rituals and whether the dead deserve universal respect and commemoration. After Vietnam’s reunification in 1976, martyr cemeteries came to displace communal temples as places of commemoration, and domestic ancestor altars were used to venerate war heroes and revolutionary leaders (Kwon 2006: 104). The inhabitants of former South Vietnam were only allowed to honor the dead heroes of the victorious socialist revolution. Vietnamese and American soldiers who died fighting on the imperialist side were not commemorated, and neither were civilians who had been massacred by American troops, as happened in 1968 to hundreds of villagers in My Lai. They were condemned to wander around as unmourned ghosts. Torn by the opposed political, familial, and moral obligations to the dead, villagers built inconspicuous roadside shrines for the spirits of the nonlocal and foreign dead (Kwon 2006: 67–8). The state’s politicization of the dead grew weaker when the planned economy faltered in the mid-1980s. Economic reforms opened the market and brought also more political and religious freedom that changed the ritual relation to the dead. Local initiatives lead to the erection and renovation of three types of shrines. Domestic ancestral altars became once more the ritual center to commemorate three generations of ancestors, irrespective of their state-defined status as heroes, traitors, or passive civilian victims. Communal ancestral temples were raised in the public domain to worship local deities and distant ancestors. Finally, shrines that looked like birdhouses were built on the boundary of the house and the street as abodes for wandering nonlocal and enemy ghosts. Kwon interprets these ghost shrines as manifestations of a cosmopolitan ethics of hospitality and memory towards the unrelated dead that coexists with the familial and communal solidarity and remembrance expressed through altars and temples.

Spain is another country in which civilians and the state clashed over the moral and political framing of the dead of war. Francisco Ferrándiz analyzes in the chapter “The Intimacy of Defeat: Exhumations in Contemporary Spain” (2010) the resurgent public memory of more than one hundred thousand civilians interred in thousands of mass graves since the Spanish Civil War of 1936–9. The victorious Nationalist forces commanded by General Franco had executed these civilians because of their collaboration with the Republican government. Franco’s death in 1975 ended dictatorial rule but did not encourage an investigation of its crimes. The new democratic government passed an amnesty law in 1977 that imposed a collective silence on Spain to preserve its political stability. It was only in the year 2000 that a grassroots movement began to exhume the mass graves and narrate the lives of the dead that had been abandoned by the state. Ferrándiz demonstrates how this popular movement finally brought the unspoken memories to light, and how the mediatization of narratives and exhumations was affecting people’s historical consciousness. Public pressure made Congress pass a Historical Memory Law in 2007 that condemned the Franco dictatorship, acknowledged the victimhood of both parties to the Civil War, and expressed official support for the exhumation of mass graves. The exhumation movement, survivor testimonies, and artistic expressions added new meaning to Spain’s political past, but without displacing the voices of the dictatorship’s ideological supporters. The diverse memories of the dead or their ghosts, as Ferrándiz calls them metaphorically, were not extinguished by six decades of state repression, and continue to haunt the Spanish state and its divided society.

Future of the Anthropology of Death

The anthropology of death is a continuously evolving field of study because of ongoing technological, empirical, and global developments that are redefining the meaning of life and death. Biotechnology is prolonging lives through organ transplants, stem cell treatments, and perhaps even cryonics, while death is lent a hand by improved palliative care and physician-assisted suicide.

Also, the anthropology of death's empirical attention to violence, suffering, and trauma has erased the strict analytical boundaries between life and death, ritual and everyday life, and mourning and memory. The study of death can no longer be confined to a particular realm of society and culture, as older generations of anthropologists assumed, because current research has shown the many continuities and interconnections of life and death. Finally, the study of globalization has made anthropologists more aware of the politics of death, and the uneven distribution of disease, care, and treatment. These shifts in the anthropology of death have taken place during the last few decades and are steering research in at least five new directions: critique, materiality, attachment, ontology, and memory.

The contributions of Hertz and Van Gennep to the anthropology of death have been invaluable and continue to inspire contemporary scholars (Davies 2000; Hockey 2002), but their seminal texts also come across as overly schematic with scant attention to issues of temporality, narrativity, subjectivity, and the multiplex affective relations between the deceased and the bereaved. The dichotomies of life and death, body and soul, and world and afterworld are powerful analytical tools that reveal important structural features but at the same time conceal other realities and neglect mutual influences. The ethnographies of death practices in Greece by O'Rourke (Chapter 19), and restless ghosts in Vietnam by Kwon (Chapter 23) are excellent examples of how to go beyond the founding fathers of the anthropology of death by demonstrating the place of death in people's everyday and political lives. This critique may even be extended to the dichotomy of human beings and animals, as done by King (Chapter 16), who hints at the similarities between human grief and animal grief.

The anthropology of death can benefit from the discipline's renewed interest in material culture and the more recent field of heritage studies to examine the multiple materialities of death. The destruction of cities and material culture deserves to be analyzed in terms of the concepts of loss and mourning (Bevan 2007; Meng 2011). The analysis of visual representations of death, pioneered by Ariès (1983), is in need of a fresh impulse from today's sophisticated visual research methods. Finally, personal objects and memento mori deserve closer scholarly attention to the ways they mediate death and mourning, as shown by Hallam and Hockey (Chapter 4).

Grief and mourning continue to be central research topics in the anthropology of death. Many anthropologists have embraced the assumption that grief and mourning vary cross-culturally but that the bereaved will eventually accept the losses and sever their ties with the deceased. However, the attachment of the living and the dead turns out to be stronger than commonly assumed. Studies in sociology and social psychology have shown that the bereaved may not break their bonds with the dead but transform them into active relations (Klass, Silverman, and Nickman 1996; Walter 1999). Likewise, anthropological research has demonstrated that the dead may remain present in the lives of the bereaved through inner conversations, cemetery visits, and spiritual interventions (Francis, Kellaher, and Neophytou 2005; Green 2008; Kwon 2006). The works by Bacigalupo (Chapter 22), Kopytoff (Chapter 21), and Robben (Chapter 18) offer different cultural illustrations of the continued ties between the living and the animate, incarnated, and political spirits of the dead.

Related to the post-mortem continuity of social bonds is the notion that life and death do not constitute coexisting ontologies but can be regarded as interconnected. The separation of life and death has deep Indo-European and Judeo-Christian roots, and can be found in the Babylonian Gilgamesh epic and the Book of Genesis (Davies 2005). The works of Hertz and Van Gennep fit in this legacy, but ethnographic research has shown that life can be regarded as a form of death or that life and death coexist in cyclical forms (Mimica 1996; Obeyesekere 2002; Parry 1994; Willerslev, Chapter 10). Kaufman and Morgan (2005) have delineated a stimulating research agenda for an analysis of the permeable boundaries and biopolitics of life and death. The articles by Lock (Chapter 8) and Hamdy (Chapter 9) are exemplary case studies of this line of research. They describe different cultural definitions of life and death, and show the state's influence on the procurement of organs.

Finally, anthropologists have examined ethnohistorical understandings of death and grief (Rosaldo 1980; Conklin 2001), and interpreted mourning through embodied memory (Connerton 2011). Others have written intimate accounts about the lives of family members during the Holocaust (Rylko-Bauer 2014; Slyomovics 2014; Waterston 2014). Recent historical works about the memory of death can give a new direction to the anthropological study of death and mourning (e.g. Black 2010; Confino, Betts, and Schumann 2011; Laqueur 2015; Seaman 2010). Ferrándiz (Chapter 24) and Robben (Chapter 18) provide two examples of how to enrich the anthropology of death with an emphasis on memory. At the same time, the research focus should not lie only on how people remember the dead but also on how the dead make the living remember them. People leave legacies in the awareness that life will end some day, and they may influence the memories that will survive them.

NOTES

- 1 “About the installation,” at <http://www.hrp.org.uk/tower-of-london/history-and-stories/tower-of-london-rememberers/about-the-installation/> (accessed December 2016).
- 2 “Tower of London Poppy Display Wins the Hearts of Millions,” BBC Newsround, November 11, 2014, at <http://www.bbc.co.uk/newsround/29993097> (accessed December 2016).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Ariès, Philippe. 1983. Images de l'homme devant la mort. Paris: Seuil.
- Bacigalupo, Ana Mariella. 2010. The Life, Death, and Rebirth of a Mapuche Shaman: Remembering, Disremembering, and the Willful Transformation of Memory. Journal of Anthropological Research 66(1): 97–119.
- Bacigalupo, Ana Mariella. 2016. Thunder Shaman: Making History with Mapuche Spirits in Chile and Patagonia. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Badone, Ellen. 1989. The Appointed Hour: Death, Worldview, and Social Change in Brittany. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Bauman, Zygmunt. 1992. Mortality, Immortality and Other Life Strategies. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Bevan, Robert. 2007. The Destruction of Memory: Architecture at War. London: Reaktion Books.
- Black, Monica. 2010. Death in Berlin: From Weimar to Divided Germany. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bloch, Maurice, and Jonathan P. Parry. 1982. Introduction: Death and the Regeneration of Life. In Death and the Regeneration of Life, ed. Maurice Bloch and Jonathan P. Parry, pp. 1–44. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Capdevila, Luc, and Danièle Voldman. 2006. War Dead: Western Societies and the Casualties of War. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Cátedra, María. 1992. This World, Other Worlds: Sickness, Suicide, Death, and the Afterlife among the Vaqueiros de Alzada of Spain. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Clark-Decès, Isabelle. 2005. No One Cries for the Dead: Tamil Dirges, Rowdy Songs, and Graveyard Petitions. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Confino, Alon, Paul Betts, and Dirk Schumann, eds. 2008. Between Mass Death and Individual Loss: The Place of the Dead in Twentieth-Century Germany. New York: Berghahn Books.
- Conklin, Beth A. 1993. Hunting the Ancestors: Death and Alliance in Wari' Cannibalism. Latin American Anthropology Review 5(2): 65–70.
- Conklin, Beth A. 1995. “Thus are our bodies, thus was our custom”: Mortuary Cannibalism in an Amazonian Society. American Ethnologist 22(1): 75–101.
- Conklin, Beth A. 2001. Consuming Grief: Compassionate Cannibalism in an Amazonian Society. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Connerton, Paul. 2011. The Spirit of Mourning: History, Memory and the Body. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Danforth, Loring M. 1982. The Death Rituals of Rural Greece. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Davies, Douglas J. 2000. Robert Hertz: The Social Triumph over Death. Mortality 5(1): 97–102.
- Davies, Douglas J. 2005. A Brief History of Death. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Desjarlais, Robert. 2003. Sensory Biographies: Lives and Deaths among Nepal's Yolmo Buddhists. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Desjarlais, Robert. 2016. Subject to Death: Life and Loss in a Buddhist World. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- de Waal, Frans B. M., ed. 2002. Tree of Origin: What Primate Behavior Can Tell Us about Human Social Evolution. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- de Waal, Frans B. M. 2009. The Age of Empathy: Nature's Lessons for a Kinder Society. New York: Harmony Books.
- Durkheim, Émile. 1995 [1912]. The Elementary Forms of Religious Life. Trans. Karen E. Fields. New York: Free Press.
- Edelman, Gerald M. 1992. Bright Air, Brilliant Fire: On the Matter of the Mind. New York: Basic Books.
- Eksteins, Modris. 1989. Rites of Spring: The Great War and the Birth of the Modern Age. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
- Evans-Pritchard, E. E. 1968 [1937]. Witchcraft, Oracles and Magic among the Azande. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Fabian, Johannes. 2004 [1973]. How Others Die: Reflections on the Anthropology of Death. In Death, Mourning, and Burial: A Cross-Cultural Reader, ed. Antonius C. G. M. Robben, pp. 49–61. Oxford: Blackwell.

- Ferrándiz, Francisco. 2010. The Intimacy of Defeat: Exhumations in Contemporary Spain. In Unearthing Franco's Legacy: Mass Graves and the Recovery of Historical Memory in Spain, ed. Carlos Jerez-Farrán and Samuel Amago, pp. 304–25. Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Francis, Doris, Leonie Kellaher, and Georgina Neophytou. 2005. The Secret Cemetery. Oxford: Berg.
- Freud, Sigmund. 1968 [1917]. Mourning and Melancholia. In The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, ed. James Strachey, vol. 14, pp. 243–58. London: Hogarth Press.
- Gell, Alfred. 1998. Art and Agency: An Anthropological Theory. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Goody, Jack. 1962. Death, Property and the Ancestors: A Study of the Mortuary Customs of the LoDagaa of West Africa. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Green, James W. 2008. Beyond the Good Death: The Anthropology of Modern Dying. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Hallam, Elizabeth, and Jenny Hockey. 2001. Death, Memory and Material Culture. Oxford: Berg.
- Hamdy, Sherine. 2012. Our Bodies Belong to God: Organ Transplants, Islam, and the Struggle for Human Dignity in Egypt. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hamdy, Sherine. 2016. All Eyes on Egypt: Islam and the Medical Use of Dead Bodies amidst Cairo's Political Unrest. Medical Anthropology 35(3): 220–35.
- Haram, Liv. 2010. 'We Are Tired of Mourning!': The Economy of Death and Bereavement in a Time of AIDS. In Morality, Hope and Grief: Anthropologies of AIDS in Africa, ed. Hansjörg Dilger and Ute Luig, pp. 219–39. New York: Berghahn.
- Hertz, Robert. 1905–6. Contribution à une étude sur la représentation collective de la mort. L'Année Sociologique 10: 48–137.
- Hertz, Robert. 1960. Death and the Right Hand. Trans. Rodney Needham. London: Cohen & West.
- Hinton, Alexander Laban. 2005. Why Did They Kill? Cambodia in the Shadow of Genocide. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hockey, Jenny. 1990. Experiences of Death: An Anthropological Account. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Hockey, Jenny. 2002. The Importance of Being Intuitive: Arnold Van Gennep's The Rites of Passage. Mortality 7(2): 210–17.
- Huntington, Richard, and Peter Metcalf. 1979. Celebrations of Death: The Anthropology of Mortuary Ritual. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hurst, Sidney C. 1929. The Silent Cities. London: Methuen.
- Ingold, Tim. 2011. Being Alive: Essays on Movement, Knowledge and Description. London: Routledge.
- Kan, Sergei. 1989. Symbolic Immortality: The Tlingit Potlatch of the Nineteenth Century. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution Press.
- Kaufman, Sharon R., and Lynn M. Morgan. 2005. The Anthropology of the Beginnings and Ends of Life. Annual Review of Anthropology 34: 317–41.
- King, Barbara J. 2013a. The Expression of Grief in Monkeys, Apes, and Other Animals. In The Politics of Species: Reshaping our Relationships with Other Animals, ed. Raymond Corbey and Annette Lanjouw, pp. 106–14. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- King, Barbara J. 2013b. How Animals Grieve. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Klass, Dennis, Phyllis R. Silverman, and Steven L. Nickman, eds. 1996. Continuing Bonds: New Understandings of Grief. Washington, DC: Taylor & Francis.
- Klima, Alan. 2002. The Funeral Casino: Meditation, Massacre, and Exchange with the Dead in Thailand. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Knappett, Carl. 2016. Thinking through Material Culture: An Interdisciplinary Perspective. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Kopytoff, Igor. 1971. Ancestors as Elders in Africa. Africa 41(2): 129–42.
- Kwon, Heonik. 2006. After the Massacre: Commemoration and Consolation in Ha My and My Lai. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Kwon, Heonik. 2008. The Ghosts of War and the Spirit of Cosmopolitanism. History of Religions 48(1): 22–42.
- Laqueur, Thomas W. 2015. The Work of the Dead: A Cultural History of Mortal Remains. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Lifton, Robert Jay, and Eric Olson. 1974. Living and Dying. London: Wildwood House.
- Lock, Margaret. 2002. Twice Dead: Organ Transplants and the Reinvention of Death. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Lock, Margaret. 2004. Living Cadavers and the Calculation of Death. Body and Society 10(2–3): 135–52.
- Malinowski, Bronislaw. 1954 [1925]. Magic, Science and Religion. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.
- McCrea, John. 1919. In Flanders Fields, and Other Poems. London: Hodder & Stoughton.
- Meng, Michael. 2011. Shattered Spaces: Encountering Jewish Ruins in Postwar Germany and Poland. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Mimica, Jadran. 1996. On Dying and Suffering in Iqwaye Existence. In Things as They Are: New Directions in Phenomenological Anthropology, ed. Michael Jackson, pp. 213–37. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Mosse, George L. 1990. Fallen Soldiers: Reshaping the Memory of the World Wars. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Nelson, Christopher. 2008. Dancing with the Dead: Memory, Performance, and Everyday Life in Postwar Okinawa. Durham: Duke University Press.

Death, Mourning, and Burial

- Obeyesekere, Gananath. 2002. Imagining Karma: Ethical Transformation in Amerindian, Buddhist, and Greek Rebirth. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- O'Rourke, Diane. 2007. Mourning Becomes Eclectic: Death of Communal Practice in a Greek Cemetery. American Ethnologist 34(2): 387–402.
- Palgi, Phyllis, and Henry Abramovitch. 1984. Death: A Cross-Cultural Perspective. Annual Review of Anthropology 13: 385–417.
- Parkin, Robert. 1996. The Dark Side of Humanity: The Work of Robert Hertz and Its Legacy. Amsterdam: Harwood Academic.
- Parry, Jonathan P. 1994. Death in Banaras. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Radcliffe-Brown, A. R. 1933 [1922], The Andaman Islanders. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Robben, Antonius C. G. M. 2000. State Terror in the Netherworld: Disappearance and Reburial in Argentina. In Death Squad: The Anthropology of State Terror, ed. Jeffrey A. Sluka, pp. 91–113. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Robben, Antonius C. G. M., ed. 2004. Death, Mourning, and Burial: A Cross-Cultural Reader. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Robben, Antonius C. G. M. 2005. Political Violence and Trauma in Argentina. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Robben, Antonius C. G. M. 2014. Massive Violent Death and Contested National Mourning in Post-Authoritarian Chile and Argentina: A Sociocultural Application of the Dual Process Model. Death Studies 38(5): 335–45.
- Rosaldo, Renato. 1980. Ilongot Headhunting, 1883–1974: A Study in Society and History. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Rosaldo, Renato. 1989. Culture and Truth: The Remaking of Social Analysis. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Rosaldo, Renato. 2014. The Day of Shelly's Death: The Poetry and Ethnography of Grief. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Rosenblatt, Paul C., R. Patricia Walsh and Douglas A. Jackson. 1976. Grief and Mourning in Cross-Cultural Perspective. New Haven: HRAF Press.
- Russ, Ann Julienne. 2005. Love's Labor Paid for: Gift and Commodity at the Threshold of Death. Cultural Anthropology 20(1): 128–55.
- Rylko-Bauer, Barbara. 2014. A Polish Doctor in the Nazi Camps: My Mother's Memories of Imprisonment, Immigration, and a Life Remade. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.
- Sanford, Victoria. 2003. Buried Secrets: Truth and Human Rights in Guatemala. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Scheper-Hughes, Nancy. 1992. Death Without Weeping: The Violence of Everyday Life in Brazil. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Seeman, Erik R. 2010. Death in the New World: Cross-Cultural Encounters, 1492–1800. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Seremetakis, C. Nadia. 1991. The Last Word: Women, Death, and Divination in Inner Mani. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Shepard, Glenn H. Jr. 2002. Three Days for Weeping: Dreams, Emotions, and Death in the Peruvian Amazon. Medical Anthropology Quarterly 16(2): 200–29.
- Shore, Bradd. 1996. Culture in Mind: Cognition, Culture, and the Problem of Meaning. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Slyomovics, Susan. 2014. How to Accept German Reparations. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Suzuki, Hikaru. 2000. The Price of Death: The Funeral Industry in Contemporary Japan. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Turner, Victor. 1967. Betwixt and Between: The Liminal Period in Rites de Passage. In The Forest of Symbols: Aspects of Ndembu Ritual, pp. 93–111. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Tylor, E. B. 1930. Anthropology: An Introduction to the Study of Man and Civilization. Vol. 2. London: Watts.
- Van Gennep, Arnold. 1960 [1909]. The Rites of Passage. Trans. Monika B. Vizedom and Gabrielle L. Caffee. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Verdery, Katherine. 1999. The Political Lives of Dead Bodies: Reburial and Postsocialist Change. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Vitebsky, Piers. 1993. Dialogues with the Dead: The Discussion of Mortality among the Sora of Eastern India. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Viveiros de Castro, Eduardo. 1998. Cosmological Deixis and Amerindian Perspectivism. Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute 4(3): 469–88.
- Walter, Tony. 1999. On Bereavement: The Culture of Grief. Buckingham: Open University Press.
- Waterston, Alisse. 2014. My Father's Wars: Migration, Memory, and the Violence of a Century. New York: Routledge.
- Whitehead, Neil J. 2002. Dark Shamans: Kanaimà and the Poetics of Violent Death. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Willerslev, Rane. 2009. The Optimal Sacrifice: A Study of Voluntary Death among the Siberian Chukchi. American Ethnologist 36(4): 693–704.
- Winter, Jay. 1995. Sites of Memory, Sites of Mourning: The Great War in European Cultural History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Part I

Conceptualizations of Death

A Contribution to the Study of the Collective Representation of Death

Robert Hertz

We all believe we know what death is because it is a familiar event and one that arouses intense emotion. It seems both ridiculous and sacrilegious to question the value of this intimate knowledge and to wish to apply reason to a subject where only the heart is competent.

Yet questions arise in connection with death which cannot be answered by the heart because the heart is unaware of them. Even for the biologist death is not a simple and obvious fact; it is a problem to be scientifically investigated. But where a human being is concerned the physiological phenomena are not the whole of death. To the organic event is added a complex mass of beliefs, emotions and activities which give it its distinctive character. We see life vanish but we express this fact by the use of a special language: it is the soul, we say, which departs for another world where it will join its forefathers. The body of the deceased is not regarded like the carcass of some animal: specific care must be given to it and a correct burial; not merely for reasons of hygiene but out of moral obligation. Finally, with the occurrence of death a dismal period begins for the living during which special duties are imposed upon them. Whatever their personal feelings may be, they have to show sorrow for a certain period, change the colour of their clothes and modify the pattern of their usual life. Thus death has a specific meaning for the social consciousness; it is the object of a collective representation. This representation is neither simple nor unchangeable: it calls for an analysis of its elements as well as a search for its origin. It is to this double study that we wish to contribute here.

In our own society the generally accepted opinion is that death occurs in one instant. The only purpose of the two or three days' delay between the demise and the burial is to allow material preparations to be made and to summon relatives and friends. No interval separates the life ahead from the one that has just ceased: no sooner has the last breath been exhaled than the soul appears before its judge and prepares to reap the reward for its good deeds or to expiate its sins. After this sudden catastrophe Original publication details: Extracts from Robert Hertz, "A Contribution to the Study of the Collective Representation of Death" (1905–6), in Death and the Right Hand, trans. Rodney and Claudia Needham (London: Cohen & West, 1960). Reproduced with permission from Taylor & Francis.

Death, Mourning, and Burial: A Cross-Cultural Reader, Second Edition. Edited by Antonius C. G. M. Robben.
© 2018 John Wiley & Sons, Inc. Published 2018 by John Wiley & Sons, Inc.

a more or less prolonged period of mourning begins. On certain dates, especially at the 'end of the year,' commemorative ceremonies are held in honour of the deceased. This conception of death, and this particular pattern of events which constitute death and which follow it, are so familiar to us that we can hardly imagine that they are not necessary.

But the facts from many societies less advanced than our own do not fit into this framework. As Lafitau has already pointed out, 'In most primitive societies the dead bodies are only stored, so to speak, in the tomb where they are first placed. After a time they are given a new funeral and they receive the final funerary rites which are due to them.' This difference in custom is not, as we shall see, a mere accident; it brings to light the fact that death has not always been represented and felt as it is in our society.

In the following pages we shall try to establish the complex of beliefs relating to death and practices featuring a double burial. To achieve this aim we shall first use data gathered exclusively from Indonesian peoples, in particular the Dayak of Borneo, among whom this phenomenon takes a typical form. We shall then show, on the basis of sources relating to other ethnographic areas, that these are not merely local customs. In our account we shall follow the sequence of the events themselves, dealing first with the period between the death (in the usual sense of the word) and the final obsequies, and then with the concluding ceremony.

1. The Intermediary Period

The ideas and practices occasioned by death can be classified under three headings, according to whether they concern the body of the deceased, his soul, or the survivors. This distinction does not by any means have an absolute value, but it does facilitate the presentation of the facts.

(a) The body: provisional burial

Among peoples of the Malay archipelago who have not yet been too deeply influenced by foreign cultures it is the custom not to take the body at once to its final burial place; this move can only be made after a more or less long period of time during which the body is placed in a temporary shelter.

The general rule, among the Dayak, seems to have been to keep the bodies of chiefs and of wealthy people inside their own houses till the time of the final burial.

The body is then put in a coffin the cracks of which are sealed with a resinous substance. The Dutch Government forbade this practice, at least in certain districts, for hygienic reasons; but quite different reasons besides that of foreign interference must have limited the extent of this kind of temporary burial. The living owe all kinds of care to the dead who reside among them. There is an uninterrupted wake which, as in Ireland or among our own farmers, entails much upheaval and great expenses, but for a much longer period. Furthermore, the presence of a corpse in the house imposes taboos on the inhabitants which are often severe: an inconvenience which is strongly felt because the Dayak longhouse is frequently the whole village in itself. It is for these reasons that the prolonged exposure of the body is nowadays exceptional.

As for those deceased who do not seem to deserve such heavy sacrifices, a shelter is provided by laying the coffin, after it has been exposed for a few days, either in a miniature wooden house raised on piles or, more often, on a kind of platform simply covered by a roof. This temporary burial place is sometimes in the immediate neighbourhood of the deceased person's house, but more often it is in a deserted place in the depth of the forest. Thus, if the deceased no longer has a place in the big house of the living, he at least possesses his own little house, one which is almost identical with those temporarily occupied by Dayak families when the cultivation of rice forces them to scatter over an area which is often very extensive.

This type of temporary burial, although apparently the most common one in the Malay archipelago, is not the only one that exists there; it may even be derived from a more ancient one which we find mentioned in several places: the exposure of the corpse, wrapped in bark, in the branches of a tree. On the other hand, instead of exposing the coffin to the atmosphere it is often preferred to bury it fairly deep, even though this means digging it up later. Whatever the variety of these customs, which often co-exist in one place and are substituted one for the other, the rite, in its essence, is constant; the body of the deceased, while awaiting the second burial, is temporarily deposited in a burial-place distinct from the final one; it is almost invariably isolated.

[...]

[L]et us conclude provisionally that the Indonesians attach a particular importance to the changes that occur in the corpse; their ideas in this matter prevent them from terminating the funeral rites at once and impose specific precautions and observances on the survivors.

So long as the final rite has not been celebrated the corpse is exposed to grave perils. It is a belief familiar to anthropologists and folklorists that the body is at certain times particularly exposed to the attacks of evil spirits and to all the harmful influences by which man is threatened; its diminished powers of resistance have to be reinforced by magical means. The period which follows death is particularly dangerous in this respect; that is why the corpse must be exorcised and be forearmed against demons. This preoccupation inspires, at least partly, the ablutions and various rites connected with the body immediately after death: such as, for instance, the custom of closing the eyes and other orifices of the body with coins or beads; it also imposes on the survivors the duty of keeping the deceased company during this dreaded period, to keep watch by his side and to beat gongs frequently in order to keep malignant spirits at bay. Thus the corpse, afflicted by a special infirmity, is an object of solicitude for the survivors at the same time as an object of fear.

(b) The soul: its temporary stay on earth

In the same way as the body is not taken at once to its 'last resting-place', so the soul does not reach its final destination immediately after death. It must first undergo a kind of probation, during which it stays on earth in the proximity of the body, wandering in the forest or frequenting the places it inhabited while it was alive: it is only at the end of this period, at the time of the second funeral, and thanks to a special ceremony, that it will enter the land of the dead. This at least is the simplest form taken by this belief.

[...]

The stay of the soul among the living is somewhat illegitimate and clandestine. It lives, as it were, marginally in the two worlds: if it ventures into the after-world, it is treated there like an intruder; here on earth it is an importunate guest whose proximity is dreaded. As it has no resting place it is doomed to wander incessantly, waiting anxiously for the feast which will put an end to its restlessness. It is thus not surprising that during this period the soul should be considered as a malicious being: it finds the solitude into which it has been thrust hard to bear and tries to drag the living with it. Not yet having regular means of subsistence such as the dead are provided with, it has to pilfer from its relatives; in its present distress it remembers all the wrongs it has suffered during its life and seeks revenge. It watches its relatives' mourning sharply and if they do not properly fulfil their duties towards itself, if they do not actively prepare its release, it becomes irritated and inflicts diseases upon them, for death has endowed it with magical powers which enable it to put its bad intentions into practice. Whilst later, when it has its place among the dead, it will only visit its relatives when expressly invited, now it 'returns' of its own initiative through necessity or through malice, and its untimely appearance spreads terror.

This state of the soul, both pitiful and dangerous, during this confused period explains the complex attitude of the living in which pity and fear are mixed in variable proportions. They try to provide for the needs of the deceased and to ease his condition; but at the same time they remain on the defensive and refrain from contacts which they know to be harmful. When, the very next day after death, they have the soul led into the world of the dead, it is not known whether they are motivated by the hope of sparing the soul a painful wait, or by the desire to rid themselves as quickly as possible of its sinister presence; in fact both these preoccupations are mingled in their consciousness. These fears of the living can only end completely when the soul has lost the painful and disquieting character that it has after the death.

(c) The living: mourning

Not only are the relatives of the deceased compelled to devote all kinds of care towards him during the intermediary period, not only are they the target of the spite and sometimes the attacks of the tormented soul, but they are moreover subjected to a whole set of prohibitions which constitute the mourning. Death, in fact, by striking the individual, has given him a new character; his body, which (except in certain abnormal cases) was in the realm of the ordinary, suddenly leaves it; it can no longer be touched without danger, it is an object of horror and dread. Now we know to what degree the religious or magical properties of things are regarded as contagious by 'primitives': the 'impure cloud' which, according to the Olo Ngaju, surrounds the deceased, pollutes everything it touches; i.e. not only the people and objects that have been in physical contact with the corpse, but also everything that is intimately connected, in the minds of the survivors, with the image of the deceased. His belongings may no longer be used for profane purposes; they must be destroyed or dedicated to the deceased, or at least stripped, by appropriate rites, of the harmful quality they have acquired. Similarly, the fruit trees that belonged to the deceased, and the streams where he used to fish, are the objects of a strict taboo; if the fruit and fish are taken they are used exclusively as provisions for the great funeral feast. The house of the deceased is impure for a more or less long period and the river on the bank of which it is built is tabooed.

As for the relatives of the deceased, they feel in themselves the blow that has struck one of them: a ban separates them from the rest of the community. They may not leave their village nor pay any visits; those most directly affected sometimes spend whole months confined to a corner of their house, sitting motionless and doing nothing. Neither may they receive visitors from outside, nor (should this be allowed) may they answer when they are questioned. They are forsaken, not only by men but also by the protective spirits: as long as their impurity lasts they cannot hope for any help from the powers above. The ban which is imposed on them affects their entire way of life. In consequence of the funerary contagion they are changed, and set apart from the rest of humanity; therefore they can no longer live the way others do. They may not share the diet nor follow the ways of dressing or adornment or of arranging the hair which are proper to individuals who are socially normal and which are the sign of this community to which (for a time) they no longer belong; hence the numerous taboos and special prescriptions to which people in mourning must conform.

Although the funeral pollution extends to all the relatives of the deceased and to all the inhabitants of the house where the death occurred, they are not all equally affected: thus the length of the mourning varies necessarily according to the degree of kinship. Among the Olo Ngaju, distant relatives are impure only for the few days immediately following the death; then, after a ceremony during which several hens are sacrificed, they may resume their ordinary life. But as for the closer relatives of the deceased, the particular condition which affects them is not dissipated so quickly or so easily; a long time must elapse before they can be completely freed of the ban that weighs upon them, a period which coincides precisely with the length of the temporary sepulture.

During this period they must observe the taboos imposed on them by their state. A widower or a widow has no right to remarry, because the tie that binds the surviving spouse to the deceased will only be severed by the final ceremony. Indeed the close relatives, because they are as it were one with the deceased, share his condition, are included with him in the feelings which he inspires in the community, and are subject, like him, to a taboo during the whole interval between the death and the second funeral.

The facts do not always have the typical simplicity which we find, for instance, among the Olo Ngaju. The delay, often very long, necessitated by the preparations for the burial feast would prolong almost indefinitely the privations and hardships of mourning if the adoption of a fixed and relatively close date did not remedy this situation. It is very likely – though this fact cannot, it appears, be historically proved for the societies we are dealing with – that such a shortening of the mourning-period has occurred fairly frequently. Moreover, as Wilken has shown, the new date, set to mark the end of mourning instead of the final burial, need not have been chosen arbitrarily. Indeed, the state of the deceased during the intermediary period is not immutable: he undergoes changes which gradually weaken the dangerous character of the corpse and the soul and which compel the living, at certain dates, to hold special ceremonies. These dates, which at first constituted for the mourners merely stages towards liberation, have later become the time marking the end of their impurity. In this way compulsory mourning expires among the Olo Maanyan at the ceremony of the forty-ninth day and not, as among the Olo Ngaju, at the time of the final feast.

On the other hand, according to many sources, the lifting of the mourning-taboos coincides with the acquisition of a human head by the relatives of the deceased, and with the ceremony that takes place on the occasion of this happy event. But this custom too seems to be of an evolution whose principal stages we can determine. Among the Olo Ngaju the sacrifice of a human victim (whose head is cut off) is, as we shall see, one of the essential acts of the funeral feast. Sacrifice is indeed an indispensable condition for the conclusion of the mourning-period, but it is part of a complex whole and is bound up with the final burial. Among the Sea Dayak of Sarawak this rite assumes an autonomous character; certainly the ulit or taboo which constitutes the mourning ends completely only with the feast for the deceased. 'However, if in the meantime a human head has been acquired and celebrated in the village, the taboos are partially lifted and the wearing of ornaments is allowed again.' Should this procedure continue, and the practice of double burial be abandoned, a successful 'head-hunt', a partly fortuitous event and in any case external to the state of the deceased, will be enough to assure the release of the survivors.

Thus the long mourning of the relatives among these Indonesians seems to be bound up with ideas about the body and the soul of the deceased during the intermediary period; this mourning lasts normally till the second burial. Divergent customs in which this relationship is not apparent are due, we believe, to a later relaxation of the original custom.

The idea that the last funeral rites may not be celebrated immediately after death but only at the end of a certain period is not at all peculiar to the Indonesians nor to any one particular race; this is proved by the fact that the custom of temporary burial is extremely common.

Certainly the special forms which this custom takes are extremely varied; and it is very likely that ethnic and geographical reasons contribute to the predominance of a certain kind of temporary disposal of the body in a given cultural area, but that is a separate problem which we do not intend to discuss here. From our point of view there is a strict similarity between the exposure of the corpse in the branches of a tree, as is practised by tribes of Central Australia, or inside the house of the living, as is found among certain Papuans and among some Bantu tribes, or on a platform specially raised, as is usually done by the Polynesians and by many Indian tribes of North America, or lastly the temporary burial chiefly practised by South American Indians. All these various forms of temporary burial, which in a technical classification would probably have to appear under separate headings, are equivalent for us. They all have the same object, namely to offer the deceased a temporary residence until the natural disintegration of the body is completed and only the bones remain.

But certain funeral customs cannot, it seems, be reduced to this general type: the aim of embalment is precisely to prevent the corruption of the flesh and the transformation of the body into a skeleton; cremation on the other hand forestalls the spontaneous alteration of the corpse with a rapid and almost complete destruction. We believe that these artificial ways of disposal do not differ essentially from the temporary ways that we have listed. The complete demonstration of this thesis would lead us too far from our subject; it must be enough for us merely to indicate here briefly the reasons which justify it in our eyes.

Let us first note that mummification is in certain cases a mere result of temporary exposure or burial, due to the desiccating qualities of the soil or of the air. Furthermore, even when the survivors do not intend to preserve the corpse artificially, they do not always abandon it completely during its decomposition. Since the transformation which it undergoes is painful and dangerous for itself as well as for those who surround it, steps are often taken to shorten the putrefaction, to diminish its intensity or to neutralize its sinister effects. A fire is kept burning beside the deceased in order to keep malign influences at bay, and also to warm the wandering soul and to exercise a soothing action upon the body, which is surrounded by scented smoke and smeared with aromatic ointments. The transition from these customs to the practice of smoking the corpse on a wickerwork frame or to a rudimentary embalment is almost imperceptible. To pass from the spontaneous desiccation, which leaves only the bones, to the special form of desiccation which transforms the corpse into a mummy, it is enough for the survivors to have developed a desire to consign to the final grave a body as little changed as possible. In this the Egyptian funeral ritual agrees essentially with the beliefs and practices of the Indonesians: for seventy days, the embalmer fights the corruption which tries to invade the corpse; it is only at the end of this period that the body, having become imperishable, is taken to the grave, that the soul departs for the fields of Ialu and that the mourning of the survivors comes to an end. It seems legitimate therefore to consider mummification as a special case derived from temporary burial.

As for cremation, it is usually neither a final act, nor sufficient in itself; it calls for a later and complementary rite. In ancient Indian ritual, for instance, what is left of the body after it has been burnt must be carefully collected, as are the ashes, and deposited at the end of a certain period in a funeral monument, the cremation, and the burial of the burned bones, correspond respectively to the first and the second burial among the Indonesians. Evidently the very nature of the rite that is performed renders indeterminate the interval between the initial ceremony and the final one. This interval may be reduced to such an extent that both ceremonies form a single continuous whole, which does not, however, prevent the cremation being a preliminary operation and occupying, within the system of funeral rites, the same place as the temporary exposure. To this external similarity corresponds moreover a deeper resemblance: the immediate purpose of the temporary burial is, as well shall see, to give the bones time to dry completely. This transformation is not, in the eyes of the 'primitives', a mere physical disintegration; it changes the character of the corpse, turns it into a new body, and is, consequently, a necessary condition for the salvation of the soul. This is precisely the meaning of cremation: far from destroying the body of the deceased, it recreates it and makes it capable of entering a new life; it thus achieves the same result as the temporary exposure, but in a much faster way. The violent action of the fire spares the dead and the living the sorrows and dangers involved in the transformation of the corpse; or at least, it shortens that period considerably by accomplishing all at once the destruction of the flesh and the reduction of the body to immutable elements which in nature happens slowly and progressively. Thus there is a difference of duration and of means between cremation and the various modes of temporary sepulture, but not a difference of kind.

In all the rites studied so far, the soft parts of the corpse, where they are not preserved by artificial means, are purely and simply destroyed: they are looked upon as mere perishable and impure elements from which the bones must be separated; but more complex representations come to light in the practice known as endocannibalism, which consists in the ritual consumption of the deceased person's flesh by his relatives. This custom obviously does not have as exclusive aim the purification of the bones. It is not a refined cruelty like normal cannibalism, nor the fulfilment of a physical appetite; it is a sacred meal of which only certain definite groups of the tribe's members can partake and from which the women, among the Binbinga at least, are strictly excluded. By this rite the living incorporate into their own being the vitality and the special qualities residing in the flesh of the deceased; if this flesh were allowed to dissolve, the community would lose strength to which it is entitled. But, at the same time, endocannibalism spares the deceased the horror of a slow and vile decomposition, and allows his bones to reach their final state almost immediately. Furthermore, it secures for the flesh the most honourable of sepultures. In any case, the existence of this practice does not essentially alter the general type that we are trying to set up here, since after the consumption of the flesh the bones are gathered and kept by the relatives of the deceased for a certain period, at the end of which the final funeral is celebrated. During this period the soul is supposed to prowl around the bones and the sacred fire which is kept burning nearby, and silence is strictly imposed on close relatives of the deceased. Thus, endocannibalism, whatever its direct causes might be, takes its place among the various practices observed in order to lay bare the bones in the intermediary period between death and the last funeral rites.

[...]

We must beware of attributing to the various representations a generality and an explanatory value which they do not have. It would be arbitrary to elevate such and such a particular belief into a universal truth; to affirm for instance that the new body of the deceased is always formed by his volatilised flesh. In fact, as we shall see, the bones are often thought to be the material support of the disincarnated soul. These opposed concepts agree in their essential point; in different ways they express a constant theme. Two complementary notions seem to compose this theme. The first is that death is not completed in one instantaneous act; it implies a lasting procedure which, at least in a great many instances, is considered terminated only when the dissolution of the body has ended. The second is that death is not a mere destruction but a transition: as it progresses so does the rebirth; while the old body falls to ruins, a new body takes shape, with which the soul – provided the necessary rites have been performed – will enter another existence, often superior to the previous one.

During this entire period when death is not yet completed, the deceased is treated as if he were still alive: food is brought to him, his relatives and friends keep him company and speak to him. He retains all his rights over his wife and guards them jealously. The widow is literally the wife of a person in whom death is present and continuous; thus she is considered during that period as impure and accursed and is condemned in a